

My concerns on this sale seem to be against consumer choice and competition. Something the government has stressed time and time again Voom was a real choice for consumers who are stuck with one huge cable company with little care of signal deliver or customer service. Voom gave customers a real choice at a good price I am sure if it is sold to its competitor Voom will be shut down or compressed and resold by echo-star. Voom customers will be forced into a corner to buy from another provider. I was under the impression that the U.S. Government was pushing for HDTV programing and broadcasting. Voom is the only provider that even comes close to providing an affordable choice in this area. Please consider how many other great companys get bought and then squashed only for the profit margin of its competitor.
